The last five years have led to an important progress in the identification of the genetic background that controls the initiation and progression of brain tumours. Different genetic mutations in the TP53 tumour suppressor gene, mutations in other cancer-related genes (CDKN2A, PTEN) and deletions in chromosome 9p occur in both the majority of the gliomas, the most frequent tumour in the brain, and of the most aggressive glioblastomas. These findings have demonstrated that while the TP53 is a major actor in the initiation and progression of glioma, there exist other genetic lesions, each of them with a different timing of incidence and progression, than the common-type deletion of p19ARF and the expression of the mutant p53. In addition, other genes have been recently identified as potential oncogenes in human gliomas (e.g. CBFA2/E2A, WT1, EGFR, MYC, PDGFR and c-MET). The increasing number of glioma-associated mutations and the development of more molecularly targeted agents are essential in order to approach a more rational management of these devastating tumours.

Q: How to convert native angular integer to my custom typescript number (I believe we are talking about type casting here) I think we are talking about type casting.

let x: any = 5; // the type of any is 'any'
let y: any = 5; // the type of any is 'any'
let z: any = 5; // the type of any is 'any'
let a = '5'; let b = '5'; // compiler errors let c = '5'; // the result of this is 5 let d: number; // the compiler does not check for the type of '5' d = 5; // the compiler does not check for the type of '5'
